Characterize the relationship between Macbeth and Lady Macbeth. If Macbeth's main theme is ambition, whose ambition is driving the play—Macbeth, Lady Macbeth, or both? Macbeth's marriage, like the couple themselves, is atypical, especially by the standards of their time. However, despite their strange power dynamics, the two seem strangely attached to each other, especially compared to other married couples in Shakespeare's plays, in which romantic felicity appears primarily during courtships and marriages, usually restless. Macbeth offers an exception to this rule, as Macbeth and his wife are partners in the true sense of the word. Of course, the irony of their happy marriage is clear—they are united by their crimes, their mutual madness, and their mounting alienation from the rest of humanity. Although Macbeth is a brave general and a powerful lord, his wife is far from his will. Indeed, she often seems to control it, either by cunning manipulation or by direct order. And it was Lady Macbeth's deep ambition, not her husband's, that ultimately advances the play's plot, forging Macbeth to murder Duncan. Macbeth needs no help coming up with the idea of killing Duncan, but it seems unlikely that he would have committed the murder without his wife's powerful taunts and convictions. One important topic in Macbeth is the idea of political legitimacy, a moral authority that some kings have, and others lack. With particular attention to Malcolm McDuff's questioning of Act 4, Scene 3, try to identify some characteristics that re grant or invalidate the moral legitimacy of absolute power. What makes Duncan a good king? What makes Macbeth a tyrant? After Duncan's death, Scotland's nobles begin grumbles with each other about what they perceive as Macbeth's tyrannical behaviour. When McDuff meets Malcolm in England, Malcolm pretends to do an even worse king than Macbeth to test McDuff's loyalty to Scotland. The bad qualities he claims include lust, greed and a chaotic and brutal temperament. These qualities seem characteristic of Macbeth, while Duncan's general rule was marked by king's kindness, generosity and stabilizing presence. The King should be able to maintain order and must reward his subjects according to their merits. For example, Duncan makes Macbeth from Cowdor after Macbeth's victory over the invaders. Perhaps the most important quality of the real king who appeared in Malcolm's conversation with McDuff is loyalty to Scotland and its people above Macbeth wishes to be king to make his own wishes, while Duncan and Malcolm wear the crown out of love for their people. An important topic in Macbeth is the relationship between gender and power, particularly Shakespeare's study of the values that make up the idea of masculinity. What are these values and how are different characters embodied? How does Shakespeare undermine his characters' perception of gender roles? Courage, for most of the characters in Macbeth, is tied to ideals of strength, strength, physical courage and willpower; this is rarely associated with ideals of reason or moral strength. In a few moments of the play, the characters go into action, questioning each other's masculineness. Most remarkably, Lady Macbeth repeatedly educates her husband, knowing that in desperation to prove his courage, he will perform the actions she wishes him to perform. Macbeth echoes Lady Macbeth's words as he questions the male lives of the killers he hired to kill Banko, and after McDuff's wife and children are killed, Malcolm urges McDuff to take the news with the men's reserve and devote himself to destroying Macbeth, his family's killer. Ultimately, there is a strong assumption that men's lives are associated with cruelty and violence: note Lady Macbeth's speech in Act 1, scene 5, when she asks to be unimpressed so she can help her husband commit murder. And yet, at the same time, viewers are clearly meant to realize that women provide a boost that sets the play's bloody actions in motion. McDuff, too, suggests that the equation of masculinity with cruelty is not entirely correct. His comments show that he believes that emotions and reflections are also important attributes of a real man.
